

Team Dayā

A group of industry leaders is raising money to build a school in Nepal starting in about six weeks, with at least one more school lined up for 2020. One common thread among successful ad tech vets is a karma-like sense that they should invest in and pursue less commercial causes. But others have more personal reasons for joining. "Growing up in a family of educators who fought for education freedom, going to grade school in post-cultural revolution China was an undisputed expectation for me," wrote Winnie Yang, senior manager at EY. "The community school was a two classroom, one storied, brick building that held 65 students each, each student would get desk space equal to his/her shoulder width, so we used every inch and relished in every minute." Hasan Arik, CEO at Redmill Solutions, said he was "lucky enough to have a fantastic teacher in primary school who believed in me and my brain," and who set him on his path. See more and donate here.

[from September 9, 2019. To learn more: <http://www.SupportTeamDaya.com>.]